OCTOGENARIAN ENTERTAINS FRIENDS

W. H. Forse celebrated his 80th birthday last Friday night at his home south of town, a few intimate friends being invited. At the dinner table Mr. Forse recited the following poem:

I am eighty years old today,
This road leads sure to death;
The mile-stones all are passed,
Three score and ten,
I started with a crowd,
Where are they now?
I lost them on the road;
I know not how.
I lost them one by one;
I know no more,
They were not left behind;
They went before,
The way was full of hope,
Of joy and bliss,
Of pain, of woe, and death,
And happiness.
Life's journey has been short;
That is to say,
Twas morning, noon and night,
But one short day,
I'll look the record o'er.
Yes, I am right,
The journey of a day,
Morn, noon and night.
My morn was spent in dreams;
My noon was bright;
Clouds quickly gathered round,
And now 'tis night.
My glass is almost run;
Why need I care?
The hand that led me here,
Will lead me there.
Now let the time be short
When I may rest
My weary, aching head
Upon his breast.
I go from whence I came,
Life's journey o'er,
And be what I have been
And nothing more.
My dust returns to dust,
All for the best;
My soul will go to God,
And be at rest.
I've out-lived all my cares
My hopes, my fears;
I have no place for mirth,
And less for tears.
